

Hire US, America

A 16-step emergency action plan for reversing the U.S. jobs crisis

- 1. Create a Works Progress Administration (WPA) style jobs program and hire the jobless in the public sector. History has proven that, in times of widespread economic hardship, when the private sector is unable to hire, it is up to the public sector to jumpstart employment. A 21st-century WPA, similar to the President Franklin D. Roosevelt program during the Great Depression, would help get Americans back to work immediately. There's work to be done. The federal government should hire jobless Americans to restore our crumbling urban infrastructure; renovate factories and install new equipment; and provide much needed community services in education, public safety, childcare, and health care; and improve our transportation grid.
- 2. Craft a national industrial policy. Much of the current decline in jobs and the U.S. economy can be attributed to decades of failed policies that have governed the U.S. manufacturing sector. The outsourcing of American jobs and bad U.S. trade policies have stifled our middle class and compromised our nation's ability to compete in the 21st-century economy. A recovery without a concerted investment in U.S. manufacturing is no recovery at all. Congress must craft a comprehensive national industrial policy in order to reverse the mistakes of the past, restore the production of American-made goods, get Americans back to work, jumpstart our economy and secure economic prosperity for our nation's future.
- 3. Discourage outsourcing of American jobs. Allowing U.S. companies to receive tax benefits for sending jobs overseas at a time when over 31 million Americans are either unemployed or underemployed because they can't find full-time work is cruel and unusual punishment. Yet, this atrocity – the exodus of U.S. production and jobs to other parts of the globe – has been going on for decades. Its effects are being felt more now than ever before as the dream of economic security and prosperity slips further away for more and more Americans. Policy changes to discourage outsourcing are a prerequisite to a real U.S. recovery and must be enacted immediately.
- 4. Renegotiate all trade agreements, beginning with NAFTA. Touted as a key to raising North American living standards, so called “free trade” deals like NAFTA have done quite the opposite. They've created the worst polarization of wealth since the 1920s as multinational corporations have shifted production to areas where wages are low, worker rights nearly nonexistent, and little regard is paid to the environment. A revitalization of U.S. jobs and our nation's hiring cycle requires the U.S. to withdraw from NAFTA and all other trade agreements at once.

5. Stop China's unfair currency manipulation. Beijing's policy of holding the value of its currency down to give China an edge in export markets is fueling our record trade deficit, while at the same time stifling U.S. job growth. Experts argue China's currency manipulation has displaced as many as three million U.S. jobs. The U.S. must put an end to this injustice by formally citing China for currency manipulation, leveling the playing field by levying a tax on Chinese imports, and adopting a much tougher trade policy.

6. Enact strong and enforceable "Buy American" legislation. To maintain our manufacturing capability and the millions of jobs that go with it, America must prime the manufacturing pump. We must buy our own products. We cannot expect to restart our major industries and our economy without giving them the business, literally. U.S. taxpayer money should benefit U.S. taxpayers. Strong, enforceable "Buy American" legislation must be a part of the U.S. recovery strategy.

7. Provide investment tax credits for businesses to modernize their plants and purchase new machinery. A 10 percent investment tax credit for the rehabilitation and renovation of existing manufacturing facilities could pump billions of dollars into modernizing America's plants. With an additional investment tax credit for new equipment, businesses could retool their factories. If these two investment tax credits could be banked to offset future profits, millions of new jobs would be created.

8. Increase aid to states, counties and municipalities in order to restore and/or maintain vital services. Many communities have laid off, furloughed and cut back on hiring teachers, police, firefighters, childcare providers, emergency health care providers and transportation personnel due to the poor economy. Providing local governments with the financial means to restore and/or maintain these critical services will prevent local tax increases, increase employment in the community, and stimulate local businesses as families start spending again.

9. Pool a portion of the Obama Cabinet's discretionary funds and use those moneys to create emergency job creation programs in communities with the highest levels of unemployment. Each year, Congress appropriates billions of dollars that can be used at the various cabinet secretaries' discretion. And each year, billions of dollars are spent helter skelter in the final months of the fiscal year. So, rather than throwing money at government contractors, a portion of those discretionary funds should be dedicated to putting Americans back to work. Under the direction and supervision of the White House, these pooled discretionary funds could jump start local job creation.

10. Make Wall Street pay back Main Street through the enactment of a financial transactions tax. Taxing financial transactions on Wall Street only makes sense. After all, it was Wall Street, and its affection for reckless deals, which broke the economy in the first place. Economists argue a small fee on the sale or transfer of stocks, bonds and other financial assets could generate as much as $100 to $150 billion a year. The money could then be used to pay for temporary aid to states, serve as hiring incentives for public- and private-sector employers and fund infrastructure projects.

11. Build a revitalized, green economy by investing in green jobs. In addition to infrastructure jobs, green jobs will also help to ensure continuous growth and preserve America's economic security. We need to be investing in the kinds of jobs that build and sustain our economy over time. The clean energy sector offers enormous opportunities to do just that, reviving our economy while at the same time helping the U.S. to become a leader in renewable energy and energy efficiency.

12. Provide incentives for skills training and higher education. A plan for moving our country forward and reenergizing our workforce must also include measures for preparing our workforce for the future. Two years of technical training should be offered to both unemployed workers and recent high school graduates free of charge. And, tuition at community colleges, universities and high-tech institutes should be heavily subsidized, just as Roosevelt's GI Bill did after World War II.

13. Extend unemployment insurance benefits. Millions of unemployed Americans, idled in this Grave Recession through no fault of their own, depend on unemployment insurance benefits to carry them through. For many, it is the only source of income and means for providing for themselves and their family. With the ranks of long-term joblessness continuing to grow and this Grave Recession achieving record depths, it is wrong to continue stringing the jobless along with temporary benefit extensions. This recession is far from over. Congress must act now to craft a long-term extension and preserve this much-needed lifeline.

14. Add a Tier 5 to unemployment benefit extensions. The recession took many economists and government officials by surprise. And though they knew it was deep, no one expected folks to be out of work for as long as 99 weeks. Yet, thousands of people have been and are. It's safe to say at this point, these former workers are not in a recession – but a depression. Many idled through no fault of their own haven't seen an unemployment check in months. Congress' temporary extensions to date only cover the jobless receiving unemployment benefits for less than 99 weeks (Tier 4 or lower). Workers unemployed for longer than that need help. Congress must add a Tier 5 to all further extensions to cover these long-term unemployed Americans.

15. Extend COBRA and the 65 percent subsidy. COBRA allows millions of Americans to continue receiving health care benefits for a maximum of 18 months after leaving their employer. But in a recession plagued by long-term unemployment, more and more people are finding themselves out of work long after their benefits expire. When passing the health care reform bill, Congress failed to include a measure extending COBRA benefits until 2014, when many of the new, state-run health care exchanges would be in place. In addition, measures to extend a 65 percent government subsidy, which helps millions even afford COBRA coverage, continue to hang in a political purgatory. Without COBRA or the subsidy, many jobless Americans will be left without health care coverage or, worse, forced to forego coverage in order to feed their family, pay bills and/or keep a roof over their head. A long-term extension of overall COBRA coverage and the 65 percent subsidy would ensure workers and their families are continuously protected.

16. Increase the maximum food stamp benefit amount and expand the income requirement threshold for eligibility to include the jobless. Food is no longer an everyday expense for millions of Americans who have lost their jobs. In many cases, buying groceries is sometimes weighed against making a rent or mortgage payment, seeking medical care or paying a utility bill. For that reason, millions of jobless Americans have turned to food stamps. But research shows that by the third week, 90 percent of those benefits are gone in the average household. In addition, thousands of jobless Americans – especially those without dependants – have been denied food assistance because they don't meet the income requirements. Even when applying under meager unemployment benefits, many are being told they make too much money and are, therefore, denied help. We need to ensure every unemployed person receives the supplemental nutrition assistance they need to make it through these very long and extremely difficult times.
